*Why did the N.Y. Times
call Labor Leader*

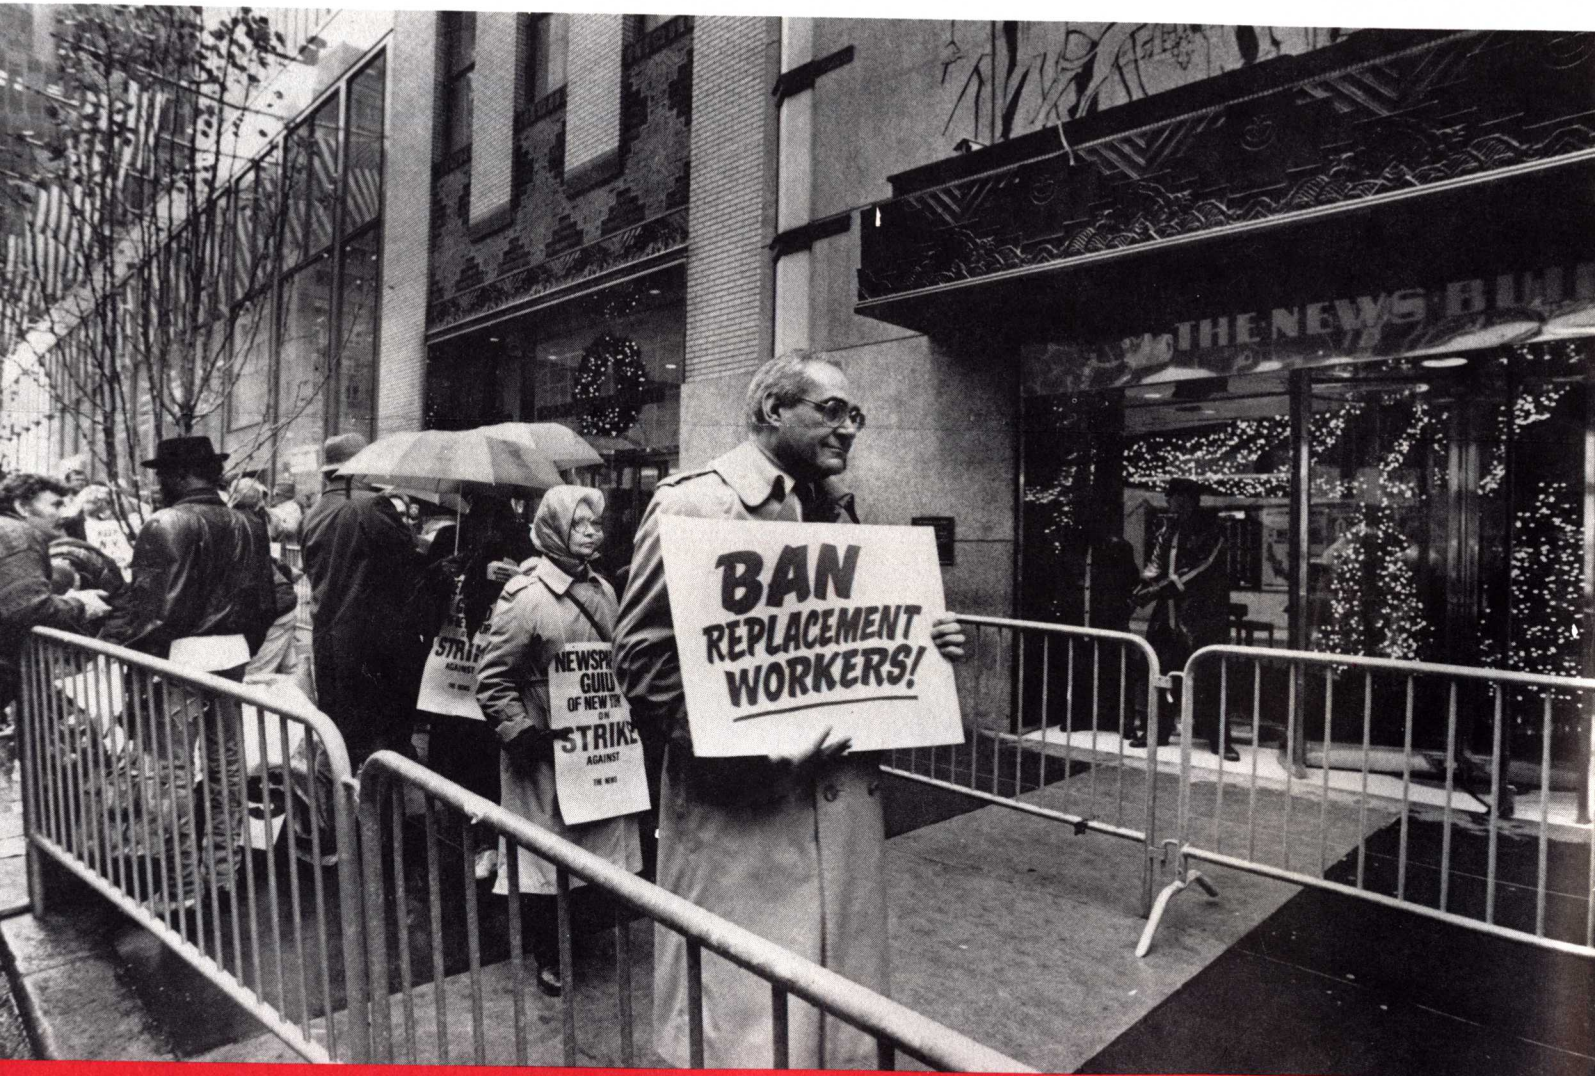

BARRY FEINSTEIN...

“one of the most astute political strategists—and perhaps the most influential union leader—in city or state government....”?

—N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 1990

HE TAKES THE LEAD

Barry has the insight, intelligence and the courage of a leader. There are unions with nearly 10 times his membership, yet he is the one who sets the pattern. He is the one that government, business and civic leaders seek out. They recognize a leader.

- Barry Feinstein in 1975 was one of several union presidents who sat down with business, banking, real estate and government representatives to work out a formula to bail New York City out of its money crisis. The city emerged in super shape and Barry Feinstein stood out as a clear leader. Today his Local often is the lead union in negotiations.
- Barry has chaired the New York State Public Employee Conference for 14 consecutive years. The conference is comprised of 45 unions representing 1.1 million workers.
- Barry put together the group of 140 Teamster Locals and 10 Joint Councils who waged the legal fight to protect Local Teamster leaders from the burdensome effects of the consent decree.
- Barry more than doubled the number of Teamsters in the Public Employee Division from 95,000 to nearly 200,000 since he took over as director nine years ago.
- Barry was a major force in providing assistance to strikers and their unions in the long, bloody and eventually successful strike against the Daily News in New York.

Feinstein A Major Figure In Planning Teamster Conference

Local 237 President Barry Feinstein played a key role along with several other top Teamster executives in putting together the first emergency national meeting in International history.

In a matter of a few weeks, Feinstein along with Carmen E. Parise, director of the newspaper drivers division; John Climaco, general counsel of the I.B.T.; Paul Locigno, I.B.T. director of governmental affairs, and Duke Zeller, Communications Director of the I.B.T., arranged a meeting site, set up a program, organized guest speakers and put together a thick kit outlining the procedures to follow in the fight against any government takeover.

BORN TO LEAD

BARRY FEINSTEIN was born into a Teamster household. His father, a former city driver, rose to become a leader and founder of the Teamster Local Barry now runs. Barry built the Local into the second largest in the Teamster organization.

Barry learned first hand from his dad what it took to be a Teamster leader and he learned at an early age. He began his career at Local 237 as an organizer while still attending school. He advanced through the ranks to business agent, trustee, vice president, secretary treasurer and in 1967, was elected president. By this time Barry had completed his education including a law degree from the New York Law School. He has been reelected Local president every time by acclamation.

Feinstein was chosen by the governor and confirmed by the New York Senate to serve as a board member of the Metropolitan Transportation Authority—an agency that is responsible for all the mass transit and commuter rail line service to New York City. He is the first representative of labor to serve on the board.

He serves on numerous state and city government committees and is consulted frequently on economic concerns that impact on workers.

In 1974 his union members struck the New York City Housing Authority and for several days, some 600,000 residents of public housing were without heat and services. In 1971 his members virtually paralyzed the city for two days when his bridge tender members walked off the job leaving some 61 bridges in New York City stuck in an upright position.

Barry is a labor leader to be reckoned with. Maybe that's why his 20,000 members today enjoy very rich contracts.

Barry has been honored by numerous organizations including American Jewish Congress, Boy Scouts of America, Sons of Italy, Irish American Labor Coalition, NAACP, Hispanic Society, Emerald Society and the recipient of the coveted Roberto Clemente Award.

The father of two boys, Barry is married to the former Marguerite DeViesti.
